HAVE now given a general view of the Walcheren Intermittent fever., and stated the treatment which was commonly pursued for its removal, where no adverse circumstances interfered, and prevented its adoption. The Walcheren Intermittents were not common cases, not such as would, to use a sporting phrase, afford a man fair play, they were so combined with dangerous and perplexing symptoms as at times to baffle experience and render the efforts of art fruitless. In a stomach irritable in the extreme., how could bark, or the usual medicines, be given with-safety? how could they be exhibited without danger? and when the intestinal canal was irritable, and disposed to success in their favor, is not always safe because-not always-safe, and all that can be done-in situations so unpropitious is cautiously to attempt to do good, but still more cautiously to avoid doing harm. It is not to be expected that a physician would have been mad enough to administer the cuprum, or zincum vitriolatum? Again where difficult respiration, pain of the breast, and distressing cough existed with a severe quotidian intermittent common remedies were positively forbidden, and when in addition to these symptoms there was often visceral disease, anasarca swellings, and great oedema of the feet, the Walcheren-Intermittents were often attended with pernicious symptoms/ and such cases were always attended with a distressing cough, and a troublesome expectoration existed it was impossible to administer any effectual...
